For example, if John has seen my message,

Mixed Real Conditionals

(Download this explanation in PDF here.)

1: We can use mixed real conditionals to talk about specific past situations with a present result. So, we can use a past tense, or the present perfect, in the if-clause to say that we're not certain that the action in the if-clause happened, but if it did, this is the result in the present.

- If John has seen my message, he is on his way here now. (I don't know if John has seen my message or not, but if he has, he is on his way here now.)

It's very common to use a modal verb in the main clause here, especially 'will + infinitive', or 'will + be + verb-ing', to make a guess about the present. We don't use 'would' in this case.

- If Lucy went home, she'll be there now.
- If she caught the plane, she should be arriving now.
- If the parcel arrived, the children will be happy at the moment.
- If he missed the train, he could still be at the station.
- If he didn't call Lucy, she might not know about the meeting.

2: We can use mixed real conditionals to talk about specific past situations, but this time with future results. So, again we can use a past tense, or the present perfect, in the if-clause and 'will' in the main clause to say that we're not certain that the action in the if-clause happened, but if it did, this will be the result in the future.

- If Julie went home early, in the past, she'll be there when the delivery arrives later. (The result is in the future.)
- If Amanda has been working today, she'll be tired tonight.

It's also very common here to use a modal verb in the main clause.

- If Julie went home early, she might be there later.
- If John went to school today, he could be at home at 6 p.m.
- If she's done the shopping, she can make us a lovely meal tonight.

3: We can use mixed real conditionals to talk about specific present situations with future results. We can use a present tense in the if-clause, and a future tense in the main clause, if we want to say that a situation happening now will have an effect on the future. Even though this looks the same as the first conditional, the present tense here in the if-clause is talking about the present (in the first conditional, the present tense in the if-clause is talking about the future.) We usually use a time word to make that clear.

- If David's studying now, he'll go to the gym later.
- If Lucy's at work at the moment, she won't leave until at least 7 p.m.

Again, we can choose to use a modal verb, apart from will, in the main clause.
